If $f(c) < f(d)$, then f must take a local minimum within $[a, d]$, otherwise in $[c, b]$.

This is a consequence of the Intermediate Value Theorem, which states that a continuous function on an interval is taking all its intermediate values.